Is Our Body Really The Temple Of God?

I want to get in shape. Why? Because I'm not. And that bothers me.

It bothers me for a couple of reasons. First, because I feel crummy. I think I would feel soooo much better and be soooo much healthier if I were in shape. Second, because I do believe my body is a Temple of God's Spirit. So, rather than continue to add rooms to that temple, I've decided to commit myself to exercise and an improved diet.

According to the weigh charts I'm overweight. I'm not too far above the normal scale, but above it none the less. Why is that? Because I love good food.

I weigh a great deal more than when I married Dianne. I weighed 150 pounds on our wedding day (too thin) and have now made it to...well...a bit more. For 6'1", my weight is not yet a complete disaster, but, if I don't take this seriously now...it's going to be much harder to whip this old temple into shape properly.

However, here's the question I've had to deal with: What constitutes good stewardship of one's body? Is our body really a temple? Or, is that something we say when we want to keep teenagers from smoking? If our body really is a temple, then is eating a chili dog or an ice cream sandwich a sin? How about eggs? Scientists tells us they are both bad and good for us.

It seems to me that if one takes the whole body as temple thing seriously, they could consider virtually anything harmful to it to be a potential sin. But, what is healthy? Is it low calories, low fat, and who dictates what is low?

What do you think? What constitutes a faithful response to the truth that our body is temple of God's Spirit?
